The UK delays a new tax on big tech firms

The BBC explains that there needs to be a global agreement on technology company tax. Without such an agreement, there could be a risk of a mess with different countries doing their own thing. The decision came as France agreed to delay a new tax on multinational technology companies after clear unease from Washington. The organisation charged with brokering a global compromise has said the UK should hold fire on its digital sales tax. Read the full story on BBC

Digital tax became the world's hottest debate for 2020

The New York Times reports on how tech taxes are becoming a hot topic of debate and discomfort between the US and the European Union. With foreign governments' looking to tax American tech giants that supply internet search, online shopping and social media to their citizens, this question is emerging as the largest global economic battle of 2020. To tax or not to tax? That is the question...

The Guardian said that the chancellor, Sajid Javid, has insisted that the UK will go ahead with plans for a tax on tech companies in April despite pressure from the US to drop the idea. The US treasury secretary, Steven Mnuchin, said the proposed digital services tax is discriminatory against US multinationals and there would be retribution – probably a tax on UK car exports to the US – if the 2% levy were to be imposed in April. Will the digital tax be scrapped for the sake of a UK-US trade deal?

City A.M. opened the debate: Is it worth scrapping the planned digital services tax for the sake of a UK-US trade deal? The newspaper gives two points of view: Morgan Schondelmeier, head of development at the Adam Smith Institute saying yes while Areeq Chowdhury, head of Think Tank at Future Advocacy, saying no.
